When asked how he differs from other health care attorneys, Eric will say that he has been practicing health care law since before it was recognized as a legal specialty. This experience allows him to identify potential problems and solve them efficiently and quickly.

Experience

Eric Fader has represented health care providers and other corporate clients in connection with business planning and contractual issues, transactional matters, and federal and state regulatory compliance for more than 35 years. His clients include providers of the technical and professional components of intraoperative neurophysiologic monitoring (IONM) services; telehealth, teletherapy and telepharmacy platform providers; Article 28 licensed diagnostic and treatment centers and ambulatory surgery centers; imaging centers; medical spas; urgent care providers; and private practices of all types. Eric has also represented medical device suppliers, equipment vendors, and providers of revenue cycle management and other health care industry services in contractual and regulatory matters.

Eric advises on billing and reimbursement questions; federal and state anti-kickback and self-referral issues; corporate practice of medicine and fee-splitting issues in many states; HIPAA compliance (including privacy and data breaches); private payor and Medicare audits and recoupment demands; state licensure and certificate of need matters; and hospital privilege issues. His work also includes organizational matters, corporate governance and structuring/restructuring advice, limited liability company operating agreements, shareholder and partnership agreements and disputes, labor and employment law issues, private securities offerings, joint ventures, mergers and acquisitions.

A frequent writer and commentator on health care issues, Eric has written for and has been quoted in Bloomberg BNA, Law360 and Thomson Reuters Westlaw, among many others. Eric is the editor of Rivkin Rounds, "Your Prescribed Dose of Health Law News," for businesses, professionals, investors, and stakeholders in the health care industry.
